Relationships with adolescents.

I especially appreciate Frank's affirmation of therapy with opportunistically for her involvement in client's development, resulting in a dependent value to the initial stages. The adolescents' potential to help the reader see the context of the present as a part of the larger whole is ongoing. Frank's work is eclectic, and incorporates ideas from Gestalt, existential, and cognitive-behavioral perspectives. His work is rooted in the client's experience of the present moment and the capacity to engage inself-discovery and personal growth. Frank's approach emphasizes the therapeutic process and the importance of the therapist-client relationship in facilitating change and empowerment. His work highlights the significance of the present moment and the client's ability to engage in self-reflection and self-discovery.
